have been different. The English ponies were as much improved in the game as their riders which was another surprise to heighten the discomfort of the Americans in the earlier part of the play. The English players as well as the English ponies revealed that they had been holding something up their sleeve.

GAME FREE FROM SERIOUS ACCIDENTS.

As to the formation of the teams it was as had been anticipated, the two Waterburys, Whitney and Milburn played for America and Capt. Cheape, Lieut. Edwards, Capt. Lloyd and Capt. Wilson for England. Of course the positions were as named, but Lloyd usually hit in the ball instead of Wilson. It was a game marked by no accidents of moment except that L. Waterbury had a fall when riding August Belmont's indolence in the first period and had to change his mount and J. M. Waterbury, Jr. later had what might have been a nasty spill while riding off an opponent. He really unseated himself by leaning over too far to elbow the man he was riding off and the pony came down with him. The player's shoulder was somewhat wrenched but he remounted quickly and continued in the play. This fall was immediately before the clubhouse and the most crowded part of the west stands and it brought thousands to their feet in excitement and anxiety. There were three fouls imposed, two against England and one against America but they were for illegal crossing of the man with the ball and due to seal in the pursuit.

After the game the Americans gathered in the tea room of the club and were quickly surrounded by their friends. "It was a bear of a game," said H. P. Whitney, "a very hard game to win and played with the utmost fairness by both teams. We all feel as though we had a brilliant struggle."

Lawrence Waterbury added that the Englishmen held together in a masterly way and that it was one of the hardest contests he had ever taken part in. Devereux Milburn said the play was so fast and the English ponies were so good that often ordinary team work had to be thrown aside, but that it had come out all right and so had a good ending.

The Englishmen were grouped among their ponies after the play and seemed cheerful, for if not the winners they had fully demonstrated the team was not a forlorn hope. "It was a fine game with a number of much better ponies than we had," said H. P. Whitney. "It was a good match all through, but perhaps in the last period the Americans were resting rather than acting on an aggressive basis."

Lieut. Edwards seemed well pleased with the result and spoke in high praise of his ponies, especially the gray gelding Pigeon L, which had given him most effective service.

CUT BY NO MEANS SAFE.

"The game has borne out what I said to you before it began," said H. L. Herbert, chairman of the polo association. "I believed that the English team was capable of much better play than they had revealed to us in the practice games and that while I was confident that our team would win I did not think that it would be any overdone to expect a very close match at Newport. The Hurlingham players did not even mount their ponies until the day before the contest, and then for only a brief practice. They were taking things too easily that day, but they were not to win as they had been practicing hard, and we even made them the early favorites at odd odds to win. But in the end the English team showed that they had not revealed any part of their true form and they smothered us; there was no chance for the English team this time to show much more than they were capable of. Four players, one of the highest class, but there is no doubt that they did not let themselves out or show up their ponies any more than they could help. A good start has been made, but the cup is by no means out of jeopardy. We will know more about it on Monday evening."

As there was to be a late start the Meadow Brook field was not ready until the afternoon. H. L. Herbert was the first official to arrive at the grounds, and with John Rawlinson, the Meadow Brook committee and August Belmont, who represented both the Polo Association and the Hunt Club's committee, he made a final tour of inspection of the arrangements.

TESTING THE BALLS.

Sunshine had succeeded the rain of Wednesday and the alternating English and American polo flags streamed in the breeze and made a brave showing on Joshua Crane of the Bedham Polo Club, who was the first to appear and promptly began the testing of the balls. Each of the white painted willow spheres that was to be in use, was thrown by the English players to him and weighed on a delicate scale. The rule is that no ball can be used which is over five ounces and the referee rejected one after another that weighed more than five ounces. This was no minimum weight to be considered, for a ball of three and a half inches in diameter cannot be turned from willow that will weigh less than four and a half ounces.

The automatic clock that was to time and sound the gongs at the end of each period was put through its paces and the details of putting up the score goal by goal as made under each team's name were perfected.

MEANTIME a stream of automobiles had begun to come honking across Hempstead Plain from the city to the east. New York, the drive a very pleasant one through the verdure studded with yellow wild flowers and violets to the oasis of that country where the polo grounds are, the trees for miles around. But when they got near the chauffeurs and the occupants were confronted by the board of the polo grounds and the enclosure of wire netting and the welcome hidden by the new buildings, for they surrounded the Hunt Club and were beyond the field and the stands. The clubhouse built in the polo headquarters was between the stands and flags, not leaves, waved over it.

ACTO PROCESSION TO THE FIELD.

This solitary line of motor cars had the field as a target was soon augmented by lines that came from the east and west bearing the country gentlemen of the North Shore, the Wheatley Hills, Westbury, South Shore and Hempstead colonies. The special trains now came to empty their thousands of passengers to the polo grounds where the play began there were 15,000 onlookers seated or standing, and outside the entire grounds were encircled by empty automobiles.

There must have been 2,000 machines on this great line had parking space on the broad plain.

The northwest wind was half a gale and while all the men were straining every eye of them wished fervently that he had brought along a cap or soft hat. The women as they descended from the train or their motor cars and looked at their places on the high stands revealed the inadequacy of the semi-hobble skirt for some purposes, but the feminine assemblage made a delightful picture at their scanty attire and the absence of a headgear, but the hats were not so large as in evidence last spring at sporting functions attended by society. The children effects carried the polo line from the shoulders now to the end of the dress, and with costumes of serge or light silks were most on view. A few women wore feather boas with the chiffon dresses, which made a pretty contrast and was very sensible in the somewhat bleak wind.

CLUB COLORS NOT WORN.

There was no special display of the blue and white colors of the home team or of the dark blue of the challengers in either the dress of the women or the uniforms of the men. In both ranks the most distinguished personages of business, professional and society life took their places without any comment or any special recognition from any one but their acquaintances.

There was a distinguished assemblage from every point of view and if there was one element most conspicuous it was the gathering and greeting of past and present poloists. It was a sort of old home week of polo players.

When H. P. Whitney made the opening goal there was only faint and distant an "I told you so" sort of air and every one sat back in easy confidence that the Americans were to repeat their old time coup of piling up goals after goal until victory was assured. This languid appreciation was quickly followed, as the English team forged to the front, by a session of all enthusiasm that was almost a silence that could be cut with a knife. There were handclaps, but perfunctory ones, for each goal made by one of the English players, but it cannot be denied that gloom ruled supreme among the spectators. Later on when in the sixth period Milburn and L. Waterbury made the goals that tied the score there was a faint ebullition of joy that was expressed even by cheers, but at no time was there the freest outburst of rooting so familiar at a great football or baseball game.

"My, my, but I feel better," said one clubman, a party who had in the interval before the game been telling that he had wagered $1,000 to $300 that the Americans would win. "I feel better," said another, "I feel better," said a third, "I feel better," said a fourth, "I feel better," said a fifth, "I feel better," said a sixth, "I feel better," said a seventh, "I feel
